

June 30 comes but once a year, and for political watchers it's like Christmas. When you have a Governor's race, where early polls mean almost nothing, the real measure of any candidacy is what's disclosed by their campaigns in the middle of the year.

So here at GeorgiaPol we are taking a deeper dive into the financial numbers posted by the announced candidates for Governor to get a sense of who is real, who needs to improve, and who should be thinking about getting out.

We are looking at the only numbers that matter right now, the amount raised for the primary, the amount spent, and the primary cash on hand. General money cannot be used until you win the primary, so it is not included in this matchup of primary strength. Because these campaigns started at different times, we divided the amounts by the numbers of days since the campaign began, thus giving us the metrics used to judge campaigns: Raise Rate and Burn Rate.

Let's begin with the Republicans.
